NEW QUESTION: 3
Your client has the following requirements:
Many customers are installing their own solar electrical generation equipment. When these customers generate more electricity than required for their own use, the surplus can he exported back to the power grid.
In order to measure this generation, we have installed special scalar devices. These devices have separate registers to measure the energy generated (export) and the energy received (import) from the National Grid.
Both reads will be stored in kWh, but the import is subtractive and export is consumptive.
What solution should you choose to configure the measuring component types for these specific requirements?
A. Create two new measuring component types (one for subtractive import and the other for consumptive export) to enable the creation of two measuring components that will be linked to one scalar device.
B. Create one new measuring component type for creating two measuring components (one for import and the other for export) that will be linked to one scalar device.
C. Create one new measuring component type for creating a new measuring component that will be linked to two different scalar devices (one for import and the other for export).
D. Create two service points: one for subtractive import and the other for consumptive export.
Answer: A
