Oracle Solaris 11 kernel encounters a fatal error, and it results in a system panic.

What type of file does this generate?

- A. crash dump
- B. a.out
- C. tape dump
- D. core dump
- E. objdump

Answer: D

Explanation:

Explanation/Reference:

Explanation:

A kernel panic is a type of error that occurs when the core (kernel) of an operating system receives an instruction in an unexpected format or when it fails to handle properly. A kernel panic can also follow when the operating system can't recover from a different type of error. A kernel panic can be caused by damaged or incompatible software or, more rarely, damaged or incompatible hardware.

When a server kernel panics it abruptly halts all normal system operations. Usually, a kernel process named panic() outputs an error message to the console and stores debugging information in nonvolatile memory to be written to a crash log file upon restarting the computer. Saving the memory contents of the core and associated debugging information is called a "core dump."
