NEW QUESTION: 1

Which three statements are benefits of using a shadow router as the source of IP SLA measurements? (Choose three.)

- A. It offsets the resource load from a production router.
- B. It provides a better estimation of Layer 2 network traffic.
- C. It can be managed independently of production network traffic.
- D. It enables switched traffic to take precedence over local traffic.

E. It reduces traffic through existing interfaces by adding another network interface.

F. It adds an NTP synchronization point.

Answer: A,B,C

Explanation:

A dedicated router used as a source of IP SLA measurement is also called a shadow router.

Implementing IP SLA with a shadow router has several advantages:

Dedicated router would offset the resource load on production router from the implemented IP SLA Network Management operations. Dedicated router would be a central device that can be independently managed without any impact on network traffic. Granting SNMP read-write access to the device might not be such a huge security risk compared to enabling SNMP read-write on a production router carrying customer traffic.

Better estimation of Layer 2 switching performance can be obtained if the access port is placed on the same switch/linecard as the endpoint to be managed. This is because the IP SLA packets also have to traverse the same interface queuing at the access layer as the regular IP packets.

NEW QUESTION: 3

Which of these sources can you not load data into BigQuery from?

A. Google Cloud Storage

B. File upload

C. Google Cloud SQL

D. Google Drive

Answer: C

Explanation:

You can load data into BigQuery from a file upload, Google Cloud Storage, Google Drive, or Google Cloud Bigtable. It is not possible to load data into BigQuery directly from Google Cloud SQL. One way to get data from Cloud SQL to BigQuery would be to export data from Cloud SQL to Cloud Storage and then load it from there.
